Tennyson does in 'Maud,' and as Mr. Swinburne does in 'Hesperia,' eg.---

Comes back to me, stays by me, lulls me with touch of forgotten caresses, One warm dream clad about with a fire as of life that endures;
The delight of thy face, and the sound of thy feet, and the wind of thy tresses,
And all of a man that regrets, and all of a maid that allures.

Note the splendid effect of the third line. But to get this one must, no doubt, write in quatrains.

That this is a noble poem there can be no doubt; but whether it will meet with ready appreciation and sympathy in this country is a question not so easily disposed of. Dr. Huxley is no doubt right in saying that the story of the Niblungs is the epic of all the Teutonic peoples; but are we of these? There has of late been a great deal of talk about our 'Teutonic forefathers,' and our close kinship with the Germans of to-day. Of such a close kinship we should be quite willing to be proud, if it could be proved to exist. It does not follow that because we speak a German tongue we must be a German people. Language is not a final and absolute test of race, and almost everything else but language—almost everything that denotes the temperament of a people —seems to point to the conclusion that the basis of the population did not cease, after the arrival of the shadowy White Horse, to be Celtic, as it had been. One proof, perhaps, of this is that, although the very names of the days of the week are the names of the Northern gods, there is scarcely a tittle of folk-lore derived from Odin, or Freyr, or Thor, or Loki, whose doings are not much more familiar to our non-reading classes than those of the gods of Polynesia. And a people cannot read itself into a folk-lore. A great novelist used to say that he believed no tales that were not told him by his great-grandmother. To the Scandinavian, the Edda was literally, as the word imports, a 'great-grandmother' telling her tales. And the truth is that we in this country have, properly speaking, no great-grandmother's tales older than the legends about Robin Hood. Even Arthur has no more real vitality than Jack the Giant-killer and Cormoran. Not Blackmore, nor Bulwer, nor even Mr. Tennyson, can ever galvanize him into the hero of a popular epic. What with Saxon upon Celt, and Norman upon Saxon, we have lost both 'Sigurd the Golden' and the 'Blameless King.'

38. Edmund Gosse, review, Academy

9 December 1876, x, 557–8

Gosse (1849–1928) was one of the most prolific reviewers and literary journalists of his time.

The opening account of the story is omitted.

So familiar is the story to our readers that we need hardly retell it.
Suffice it to say that Mr. Morris has treated it in a manner fully worthy of the heroic plan. The style he has adopted is more exalted and less idyllic, more rapturous and less luxurious—in a word, more spirited and more virile than that of any of his earlier works. His first small volume was full of colour and quaint form; it reproduced with unequalled brilliance the strange romantic beauty of minute mediaeval architecture and ornament. But there seemed more of art than of nature, more of culture than of inspiration. In Jason the whole field of vision was enlarged and humanized; there was less attention paid to detail but more to composition; there was manifest for the first time a power of poetic narrative unrivalled in our time. In the Earthly Paradise the same delightful qualities were continued and ripened, but the chord of melancholy languor was dwelt upon almost to excess. In Love is Enough higher places of the imagination were reached, and the mystical sadness had a nobler bearing. In the Story of Sigurd, however, for the first time, Mr. Morris is no longer 'the idle singer of an empty day,' but the interpreter of high desires and ancient heroic hopes as fresh as the dawn of the world and as momentous. The atmosphere of this poem is sharp and cold; a strong sense of the primal virtues, of honour, physical courage, duty to the gods and the kings, tender homage to women, interpenetrates the entire theme and gives it a solemn and archaic air. No lesser genius would have succeeded in winging a level flight through so many thousand lines without sinking to the plane of common men and common thoughts. In this poem, so steeped is the author in the records of the heroic past, so intimately are his sympathies connected with those of the mythical age of which he writes, that we walk with demigods to the close, and have no need to be told of the stature of our companions. In the presence of so much simplicity, and so much art that conceals its art, it is well to point out how supreme is the triumph of the poet in this respect. It is perhaps on this very account, and because the ordinary tone of the poem is so elevated and so heroic, that the passages which allow of pastoral and emotional treatment seem unequalled charm and delicacy. Where so much is noble, but where all is rapidly-progressing narrative, it is not easy to select a passage for quotation which will not lose its peculiar excellence by being separated from its context. Perhaps the first meeting of Gudrun and Brynhild will bear extraction as well as any other:—

So they make the yoke-beasts ready, and string the wains for the way, And the maidens gather together, and their bodies they array,
And gird the laps of the linen, and do on the dark blue gear,
And bind with the leaves of summer the wandering of their hair:
Then they drive by dale and acre, o'er heath and holt they wend, Till they come to the land of the waters, and the lea by the woodland's end;
And there is the burg of Brynhild, the white-walled house and long,
And the garth her fathers fashioned before the days of wrong.

The versification will be noted as in some respects peculiar; it depends on accents and not on syllables, each line containing as many cadences as the ordinary alexandrine, but being irregularly anaepastic instead of regularly iambic. There are always six feet in every line, but these are of very varying value, the earlier ones being generally amphimacers, that truly heroic foot which Coleridge compared to the thundering hoofs of a race-horse. Speaking less technically, the measure is a lax ballad-metre, capable of very considerable variety.

While, however, commending the style of this poem, we cannot help feeling that it will present in many places grave difficulties to the general reader. In no previous work has Mr. Morris adopted so consistent an archaism in language and phrase. The long study of Icelandic literature, too, has enamoured him of the periphrases for the gods, gold, the sea, and other objects of constant reference, which are so curious a feature of that language. To meet with the same peculiarities in a volume totally unannotated will, we are afraid, give The Story of Sigurd an air of pedantry from which its substance is wholly free. For instance, when we read that Volsung and his sons
